INK!

I Must Hasten Home.

I must hasten home, said a rosy child; Who had gaily roamed for hours; I must hasten home to my mother dear-She will seek me amid the bowers. If she chides, I will seal her lips with a kiss, And offer her all my flowers.

I must hasten home, said a beggar girl, As she carried her pitiful store Of crumbs and scraps of the crusted bread She had gathered from door to door; I must hasten home to my mother dear, She is feeble, and old, and poor!

I must hasten home, said the ball-room belle, As day began to dawn; And the glittering jewels her dark bair decked, Shone bright as the dews of the morn; I'll forsake the joys of this changing world Which leave in the heart but a thorn.

I must hasten home, said a dying youth, Who had vainly sought for fame Who had vowed to win a laurel wreath; And immortalize his name But, a stranger, he died on a foreign shore-

All the hopes he had cherished were vain. I am hastening home, said an aged man, As he gazed on the grassy sod, Where oft, ere age had silvered his hairs His feet had lightly trod : Farewell! farewell to this lovely earth-I am hastening home to God!

The Father's Forgiveness

The March night had darkened down the little New England village of Ashdale. It was a pretty place in summer, lying between two hills, on whose summit the ash trees lifted their arms to the sky, all the long, bright days, as if imploring a benediction, or spread out lovely over the white houses nestled round the one church in the vale be-

But in one house no stories were told to gladly listening ears-no soft evening hymn hushed slumbering babes to rest-no children's eager eyes looked into the embers. It was the stateliest home, by far, in the little village-a lofty mansion, gleaming white through the trees, with the roof supported by massive pillars. Nowhere did the evening fire burn brighter, but into it looked only two old people worn and sorrowful, with the shadows of grief and time upon their shriveled faces -two who had forgotten long ago, that their youth's fair castles, who looked back over wasted fields of memory, where not even setting sun rays glided their monuments built to their
